With Baby Boomers retiring left and right, questions of cognition and age are foremost in many senior citizen minds. Researchers at North Carolina State University set out to find information about how our aging population deals with the increasing complexity in the world. Thomas Hess, a professor of psychology at N.C. State, will discuss the findings of the university's recent study and demonstrate how the young and old are exactly the same and how they are completely different.